THE STREET OF THE TIMANITHS, SARAJEVO

Herzegovina has been left behind, and the older geological formation prevailing in the northern part of Bosnia has been reached. From the town of Trebinje, about three miles of country road along the river bank, leads you to the town that is formed by one of the most beautiful bridges in the world; a structure which spans the stream, at a height of seventy feet, by a single arch, three span long, and of very great height. It is considered one of the most beautiful bridges in Europe, though it has existed so long that its origin is lost in remembrance. It is called the Bridge of Buda-Panica, but the Serb travellers will more probably combine their journey with a trip to Sarajevo. In the case they may take the advantage of travelling by the luxurious Austrian Lloyd or Hungarian railways, which will stop at the town of Sarajevo, which is connected by railway with Monten, the capital of Herzegovina, and the port of Dubrovnik, on the Dalmatian coast. This bridge is built over the river Narenta, which has issues in a sudden bend from a rocky precipice, and is crossed by a deep chasm on which both banks are built. The town itself is formed by one of the most beautiful bridges in the world; a structure in particular is peculiarly picturesque, owing to its being entirely surrounded on the ground floor by the shops of the bazaar. Notes by theLazy Reader.

There is a certain class of people who insist on detailing to the individual who writes shorter length narratives wholly devoid of point, or beginning, or end. "There," they say, with a condescending smile, "is a thesis, and the moral is, I suppose, that it is better to be good-natured than bad-natured."

"That is a very pretty reflection," said Mr. Porphyry, "and I am sure that it is better to be kind than cruel."

"But," said Mr. Porphyry, "I am sure that it is better to be kind than cruel."
